After Moon, India set for Mission to Mars

Written by Admin

New Delhi: Moon can be a place to live in, is now no longer a dream. The Indian Space Research Organization (ISRO) has found the possibility of existence in moon from its recent studies. After moon, they have now planned to make their research on the Mars.

ISRO Chief K. Radhakrishnan said in Bangalore on Wednesday that they will send satellites to Mars by using geo satellite launch vehicle like Polar Satellite Launch Vehicle (PSLV) and Geosynchronous Satellite Launch Vehicle (GSLV) in 2013, 2016 and 2018. The mission should be completed in four to five years.

There has been a lot of activity around Mars of late. NASA's Mars missions include the Orbiter, 2001 Mars Odyssey, two robots named Spirit and Opportunity that landed on opposite sides of the red planet in 2004, the Mars Reconnaissance Orbiter with a powerful camera, and the Mars Science Laboratory slated for next year.

On the same day, one of ISRO's honorary adviser released a science book on Mission Moon, where the concept of Chandravihar (lunar neighbourhood) came into light. This concept has proved the possibility of life in moon.

NASA's Lunar Reconnaissance Orbiter (LRO) is the first mission of NASA's vision for space exploration, a plan to return to the moon and then travel to Mars and beyond. The ISRO seemed to share a similar vision as Chandrayaan-2, slated for 2013.
